7 Tips to Reduce Outdoor Pesticide Use

Use pesticides as part of a balanced pest control program, combined with natural resistance techniques.

Pesticides can protect your yard and garden from pests, but did you know they can also harm aquatic life? After pesticides have been sprayed outside a home, runoff from sprinklers and rain can wash residue into the street, gutters and eventually into our waterways. The pesticides are then mixed into the water where they decrease oxygen, and kill fish and aquatic plants.

According to the University of California Division of Agriculture & Natural Resources (UC ANR), it's best to use pesticides as part of a balanced pest control program, not the sole source.

Long-term pest prevention using natural resistance techniques can help keep critters away from your home and garden, and harmful chemicals out of our water.

UC ANR recommends practicing the following tips at home:

1. Monitor the presence of pests and their damage
2. Alter your home or garden environment to deprive pests of food, water and shelter
3. Keep pests out by using barriers, screens and caulk
4. Plant pest-resistant or well-adapted plant varieties, such as native plants
5. Discourage various pests by modifying the way you design, irrigate, fertilize, and manage your garden
6. Squash, trap, or wash off pests
7. Encourage beneficial insects, such as beetles, to live in your garden

Meet the Beneficials: Natural Enemies of Garden Pests

Predators hunt, attack, and kill their prey. Encourage these natural enemies by providing pesticides that kill these chewing plants that provide them pollen, nectar, and shelter, and leaving some out of your infested plants. Common predators that eat garden pests are pictured below.
Green lacewing adults eat insects and spiders. Some species also eat insects.	Green lacewing larvae feed on insects, eggs, and seedlings, especially aphids.	Green lacewing eggs are laid on almost any type of plant or insect, but are not eaten by predators.	Predaceous ground beetle adults catch and devour insects, such as caterpillars and root weevils.
